DECISION NOT TO PROSECUTE OKUMA STARTS GRIEF IN JAPAN

Viscount Undoubtedly Guilty of Bribery, Says Minister of Justice, but Motive Prompting Him Was Good.

PURCHASED VOTES OF PARLIAMENT MEMBERS

Was an Unselfish Effort, Said, to Put Through Government Program and Down the Opposition.

(Associated Press Correspondence.)
Tokyo, Oct. 15.—The decision of the government not to prosecute Viscount Okuma, the recent minister of home affairs, whom a preliminary court declared had contributed $20,000 for purposes of bribery of members of parliament, has excited a controversy throughout Japan.
The controversy centers about Yukio Okada, the minister of justice, who frankly takes the responsibility upon his own shoulders, and who says:
"Viscount Okuma was undoubtedly guilty of bribery, but the act was committed not by any or which motive but solely and entirely by a sincere desire to carry out the government's policy, though in unbusinesslike disregard of the principles of the constitution. In consideration of this and of the fact that the minister is experienced and has rendered all political and public positions and has manifested his intention not to interfere in state politics for the rest of his life, we have decided to postpone prosecution.

"Criminal punishment has the double aim of preventing repetition of an offense and of warning the public against committing similar offenses. Prosecution of the ex-minister is dropped not because he was a member of the nobility or the holder of a high position but solely because we believe the end of the criminal code has been attained without subjecting him to punishment."

The same preliminary court, which found that Viscount Okuma had distributed bribery money found four members and fourteen former members of the house of representatives to be guilty of bribery. The case centers about an attempt to buy over members of the opposition group and induce them to vote for the government's project to increase the army by two divisions. That project was adopted by the last session of the diet. The disclosure of bribery scandals and the subsequent resignation of Viscount Okuma led to the collapse of the entire Okuma ministry. The cabinet later returned to office in a reconstructed form.

The records of the preliminary court show that Okuma admitted that he had given certain politicians various sums of money but pleaded that he had acted for the good of the nation. "I feared," testified Okuma, "that if the proposed army expansion was rejected it might create antagonism between the army and navy and create circumstances unfavorable for the country. I thought it would be better for the country to make the house accept the government's bill even if it were necessary to expend money, to accomplish that end." Okuma continued by saying that he had not intended to bribe members of the house but merely to use the money in defending the government against attacks from the opposition.

The opponents of the decision to grant immunity to Okuma contend that the law should have been allowed to run its course irrespective of the position of the so-called owners of the defendant. They declare that it is a miscarriage of justice to give freedom to the briber and hold the bribed for trial. They contend that the argument that Okuma, having forsaken public life and gone into seclusion, is really more severely punished than he could have been by the law, is more sentimental than legal.

Says the Japan Times: "The plain fact is that the government has not the heart to brand as a criminal a man who, as one of its members, did what he considered to be in its interests, even to the extent of violating the law of the land. The government apparently considers that the offense has been adequately and sincerely expiated. But we can scarcely see how the government can avoid a very heated discussion of this question in the next session of the diet."

The warmth of the discussion throughout the country on this question is another proof of the striking growth of the freedom of public opinion in Japan, a freedom that has come from the west and is especially based on American ideas.

FIRST FLIGHT BY A UNITED STATES AERO SQUADRON

Six Aeroplanes Will Make Journey From Ft. Sill, Oklahoma, to San Antonio Latter Part of This Month.

Fort Sill, Okla., Nov. 17.—The first aero squadron of the United States army designed for use in the field in connection with troop operations will fly from its temporary station at Fort Sill to its permanent home in San Antonio, Tex., the latter part of this month. Six aeroplanes will make the flight—the first of its kind in this country.

The aerial journey will be made under conditions as nearly like those encountered in actual war time as possible. The start is expected to be made on November 20, having had weather or delay in completion of hangars. The distance to be covered is 450 miles. Stops will be made at these points in Texas: Wichita Falls, Bowie, Deature, Fort Worth, Cleburne, Hillsboro, Waco, Georgetown, Austin and finally at Granger and Temple.

The flight is intended to give a line on just how army aviators may be expected to work during a war. It is desired to test to the utmost ability of the fliers to follow a previously designated route over unknown country; it will give an opportunity to try the army transport system under simulated war conditions, since trucks following the aeroplanes will be forced to make an average of eighty miles a day on land; it will test the power of the motors to stand up under service conditions and the resourcefulness and adaptability of the army flying organization, particularly its supply department.

To each aeroplane will be assigned one truck as tender carrying the crew, tools, spare parts and other supplies. A newly developed machine shop truck, carrying a lathe and forge, will be along to maintain the squadron on the way. For minor repairs to aeroplanes forced to land through motor trouble a corps of six motorcycles carrying emergency repair kits, and all capable of great speed, will be depended upon.

The first aero squadron, Signal Corps, U. S. A., is the official designation of the flying unit. The squadron is divided into six flying sections, a transport section, a supply section, an engineer section charged with motor repairs, and a headquarters section. The officers are: Captain B. B. Foulis, commanding; Lieutenants T. D. Milling, C. G. Chapman, J. E. Carberry, T. S. Bowen and L. A. Rader. Captain Foulis is the oldest military flyer in the United States in point of service. With Orville Wright he completed the first cross-country flight made by a military aeroplane. This was made at Fort Myer, Va., in 1905.

As the first army squadron is for service with field troops, it must be separated from the army aviation school at San Diego, Cal., where opportunities for the preliminary training of aviators are excellent but where no large bodies of troops are available for reconnaissance work, observation of artillery fire and many other important duties demanded of the military flyer today.

EAST AND WEST ARE MINGLED IN CEREMONY

Third Coronation Fiesta in Kioto Last Night an Intentional Combining of Eastern and Western Customs.

(By Evening Herald Special Wire)
Kioto, Nov. 17.—The people of the empire are feasting and rejoicing over the coronation to an extent hitherto unknown in the history of Japan. The streets of Kioto last night were filled with parades dancing and singing. Men, geisha girls, and children, wearing gorgeous costumes and carrying paper lanterns, beat ancient drums and gongs.

In spite of the gaiety there were no signs of public intoxication and no disorders.
Count Okuma, the aged premier, is suffering under the strain of the long program but pluckily continues to take his part.

Kioto, Nov. 17.—While the first coronation feast was purely Japanese in entertainment and the second purely modern, the third and last banquet which was held tonight was an intentional mingling of the East and the West.

After the ancient Japanese music adapted from old Chinese airs came the modern music of the West. Two kinds of ancient music, respectively known as "Banzairaku" and "Taishairaku," were played by the court musicians as accompaniments of a dance bearing the same name, performed by the courtiers. The musical instruments used consisted of three drums, three harps and three flutes, all of different description, and various other instruments of Chinese origin. Both "Banzairaku" and "Taishairaku" are themes of the dances accompanied by music, which are performed only at the court ceremonies on happy and important occasions, such as the coronation ceremony, imperial birthday or imperial new-year party.

The modern occidental music was played by a grand orchestra of artists of the bodyguard band and the To-yama Military school band. The airs were composed for the occasion and will be handed down to the coming generation for use on occasions of similar court festivities.

The guests of the evening were the same as at the preceding banquet, and included American Ambassador and Mrs. George W. Guthrie. The emperor, crown prince and imperial princess and princesses all participated.

Beautiful autumn flowers were used for decoration, among them an abundance of gorgeous chrysanthemums of variegated hues and tints. The song-crowns and merry tunes of the ancient and modern music enlivened the occasion.

The entertainment marked the closing of the coronation ceremonies in Kioto.
